The problem it solves

A class calendar that only knows about classes leaves out the dates customers ask about most: holidays, closed days, open houses and sale weekends. Stores worked around it by creating fake classes, which then showed seats, prices and links that made no sense.

What changes

- Calendar events. Add a holiday or any other event under Education > Calendar Events: a name, a date, an optional time and a short description. It shows on the Class Calendar beside the classes, with no product behind it.
- Repeat in one step. A weekly open house or a monthly sale day is one event plus Mass Duplicate, with the same repeat rules as class scheduling.
- Colors that mean something. Give each class category its own color, so sewing, quilting and embroidery classes stand apart at a glance, and give special events their own color too.
- Print the calendar. Turn on Print Calendar and customers can print the month, without the rest of the website, on a landscape page.

Built for real calendars

- Events show only while no class filter is chosen, so a customer looking for sewing classes sees sewing classes.
- All-day events lead their day. Hovering an event shows its details.
- Every series ends. Nothing is ever created in the past.

Why it matters

Fewer "are you open on...?" calls, a calendar customers can pin to the fridge, and a schedule that reads at a glance.
